

Emily Wang, MD, MAS is the head of the health justice lab and an associate professor of medicine and co-founder of the transitions clinic network. She has a longstanding clinical and research interest in patients with a history of incarceration. She has developed expertise in training former prisoners to become community health workers. Her research explores incarceration as a risk factor for cardiovascular disease and how correctional facilities can be a meaningful point of intervention to reduce the risk of disease in the community.